

Roll & Hill

The Los Angeles Times

May 17, 2010

Los Angeles Times

Excerpt

Roll & Hill, the much-anticipated new lighting company from designer Jason Miller and managing partner Andrew Yang, had its ICFE premiere. One standout was Lindsey Adams Adelman's Agnes chandelier -- similar to her Candelabra, shown below left, except with elongated electric bulbs instead of flickering tapers. The chandelier is so new, Roll & Hill doesn't have a photo of it yet. (The fixture's finish all but disappears when viewed against the dark Javits ceiling, making my attempts at photography futile. Sorry.) But imagine this: a similar design but in black, with long light bulbs turned at random angles. Yang apologized that the chandelier had not been configured as the designer intended, but the angled lights had the effect of a necktie loosened -- a more casual and potentially cooler look. Roll & Hill's collection also includes the Excel sconce, shown below center, and the Modo chandelier, below right.

—Craig Nakano

Roll & Hill, the much-anticipated new lighting company from designer Jason Miller and managing partner Andrew Yang, had its ICFE premiere. One standout was Lindsey Adams Adelman's Agnes chandelier -- similar to her Candelabra, shown below left, except with elongated electric bulbs instead of flickering tapers. The chandelier is so new, Roll & Hill doesn't have a photo of it yet. (The fixture's finish all but disappears when viewed against the dark Javits ceiling, making my attempts at photography futile. Sorry.) But imagine this: a similar design but in black, with long light bulbs turned at random angles. Yang apologized that the chandelier had not been configured as the designer intended, but the angled lights had the effect of a necktie loosened -- a more casual and potentially cooler look. Roll & Hill's collection also includes the Excel sconce, shown below center, and the Modo chandelier, below right.

